

We are concerned about the state of public radio stations in the area of Washington, DC. It is our understanding that there is huge amount of mismanagement of public funds solicited to help run the facility and pay for staff. Some management officials are taking out-of-the country trips or sending associates in the name of research...for a local public radio station that is supposed to serve the needs of its listeners and members. Unskilled Friends of friends and relatives of friends are being hired for positions supposedly meant for 'professionals'. At least the public radio stations claim to be run by professionals. Would professionals lie about their credentials on their resume? Would professionals go shopping during the workday when there are major news stories breaking?

Somebody needs to closely monitor what is happening at a certain radio station before we have another 'ENRON' situation. We believe this WaShington, D.C. public radio station needs to be examined with a fine tooth comb. Why was money spent for elite club memberships for friends of management that don't even work there? What is going on? Check it out FCC. Check it out public radio members.
